

We are fortunate to have safety legislation

Carrying a self-rescuer so as to not breathe poisonous gasses in the event of a mine fire or explosion was made compulsory in Queensland in July 1978.

Current legislation requires refresher training to be conducted on a regular basis. The basic training is meant to simulate a worst case scenario in the unlikely event of a mishap underground. Conducting this training for new entrants to the underground mining industry is extremely challenging.

Lennon Training take safety training for new entrants to the underground very seriously. They have constructed underground galleries at their three training centres in Emerald, Moranbah and Brisbane. Each gallery is fitted with the latest in breathing apparatus, smoke generators to simulate reduced visibility, and breathing apparatus recharging stations identical to those used at the major mines.

It is good to have legislation to protect our health and safety, but that legislation is not worth much if the training to achieve compliance is not taken seriously.

*It is a long and winding road to a safe industry.
And staying safe is not the easiest road to travel.*
