

We are fortunate to have safety legislation

Carrying a self-rescuer so as to not breathe poisonous gasses in the event of a mine fire or explosion was made compulsory in Queensland in July 1978.

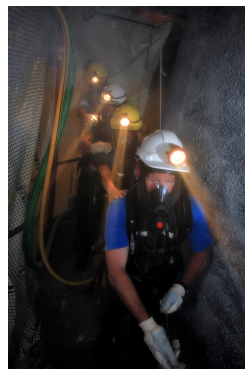

Current legislation requires refresher training to be conducted on a regular basis. The basic training is meant to simulate a worst case scenario in the unlikely event of a mishap underground. Conducting this training for new entrants to the underground mining industry is extremely challenging.

Lennon Training take safety training for new entrants to the underground very seriously. They have constructed underground galleries at their three training centres in Emerald, Moranbah and Brisbane. Each gallery is fitted with the latest in breathing apparatus, smoke generators to simulate reduced visibility, and breathing apparatus recharging stations identical to those used at the major mines.

It is good to have legislation to protect our health and safety, but that legislation is not worth much if the training to achieve compliance is not taken seriously.

*It is a long and winding road to a safe industry.
And staying safe is not the easiest road to travel.*

A day in the training room

Pretty interesting stuff actually. Well, it can be pretty interesting stuff. Oh, for sure it can be uninteresting too, but if you are not in the right frame of mind, so can some box office movies at the local theatre seem boring.

Mine site safety training is very serious stuff, but no matter how serious and important it may be, it needs to be put across to the students in a way that the message sticks.

Some 2,000 years ago Confucius said that "teaching does not start until the students have arrived". In language of today, he was saying that the student won't start picking up what the trainer is putting down until a level of two way communications is established. Anyone can read out verbiage from a document. Not everyone can tell a story from the same document.

This is an underground gallery – a simulated underground roadway with key safety features found in a typical underground mine roadway.

The original concept was mooted by various employer and employee organisations over the decades until finally a private company (Lennon's) went ahead and built the much talked about 'essential safety tool' for new entrants to the underground sector of the coal mining industry.

John Lennon was the driving force behind the building of Queensland's first underground coal mine roadway constructed specifically to help new entrants understand basic underground safety concepts. The gallery has been viewed by many in our industry – from the (then) Commissioner for Mine Safety and Health to school groups – and all spaces between.

For those readers who have been in our gallery for training, you would surely agree that apart from the compressed air breathing apparatus (CABA) and the CABA refill station, there is nothing that could be deemed as 'high tech'. Training safety does not need flash facilities or rocket scientists as trainers. Safety training needs dedicated instructors who go the extra mile to make safety training a lasting experience and a training company prepared to outlay resources to enhance learning for new starters.
